This prairie phlox is just opening and will be opening up into bright fuschia pink clusters of flowers for the next month or so. The cooler, wetter conditions has led to an extended early spring flower display of puccoons, wood betony, oxalis, creamy wild indigo, wild hyacinth, verbena, prairie violet and star eyed grass, all which continue to bloom at Prairie Park.

§ Nighthawks are beginning to return to Kansas evening displays in well lit downtowns across the state. With their distinctive “peent” calls, wobbly flights punctuated by dramatic swooping dives to catch flying insects mid-air, they are a welcome addition to spring and summer evenings. And while you’re at it, look for the chATTERINGS of chimney swifts and their dramatic dives into prominent chimneys during late dusk-- almost like a living whirlpool of movement.

§ Black locust trees are full of fragrant white flowers this week: see if you can smell them by rolling down your window as you drive by, or better yet, take a walk nearby. Look for blooms on the Kentucky coffee tree as well, and the woodland flowers jack-in-the-pulpit and may apples are transitioning into berries while gooseberries continue to grow bigger as well.

§ Warblers have returned in force and the days are full of bird songs of every flavor. Nests with eggs and young ones are in the trees; see if you can find one in your back yard or where you take walks by watching the bird activities.

§ Most years corn planting would be finished and soybean/milo well under way. It’s getting too late for much corn and soybean planting hasn’t begun either due to the wet fields. Look for long days in the field if it gets dry enough!
